For Will and Em, with my love.

Chapter One

MARNIE

Everybody hates me.

I press myself back in the seat.

Mum grips the wheel tighter.

No, they don't.

They do.

But she won't listen and we're nearly here.
The ten-foot-high prison-style electronic gates swing open with barely a whisper

and we're sucked inside the Death Star that is Wynford Independent
Highly Selective
College for Girls.

Our cheap little car creeps up the drive, mindful of the sign that says Careful of Children Crossing.

Children?

Spawn of Satan, more like.

Marnie, don't mess it up, I'm begging you.

Mum's voice is all flat,
like it got run over.

She sounded different when I was ten,
when I got into Wynford.

Back then, she screamed with joy.
You passed the entrance test!

She was dancing in the kitchen, tilting the letter in her fingers so the gold crest sparkled like a party invitation.

Better yet, you got the scholarship!
She high-fived me.
Boarding school is such a great chance – a chance to get away from here.

She meant away from this particular postcode,
from the smell of poverty and no-hope clinging to the walls of the bus stop like grease in a chicken shop.

She had a point,
but I hated Wynford College all the same.
After four and a half years of feeling homesick, of not fitting in,
I know
it doesn't matter
how small the space, how lazy the landlord, or how black the mould spores on the winter walls –

home is home.

Just keep your nose clean, Mum says now, crunching the gears.
Stay out of trouble until the exams are over.
It's less than two more terms.

'Fewer,' I say –
to piss her off,
even though she wasn't wrong –
'Fewer' than two terms. Not 'less'.

Mum's mouth snaps shut so hard her teeth clack in her skull.

Grammar-flexing.
That's what sixty thousand pounds of someone else's money gets you.

The girls at Wynford College knew I was a charity case
the minute I opened my mouth, but what really bugged them was how I didn't know my place.

It's not your accent, one girl said, moving my bed to the draughty corner.
It's your attitude we don't like.

I know I shouldn't generalise, but honestly, Wynford girls are such bitches.

That first night of Year 7

I lay awake under scratchy blankets listening to the mouth-breathing of seven hostile strangers and learned to cry
as quietly as a lie.

Mum pulls into the car park to the left of reception.

*You're so close now, she says, narrowly missing the bumper of a Land Rover.
Just get your GCSEs and stay out of trouble.
No more floral foofies, please.*

FOOFIES?

Please tell me she didn't say foofies?
Mum's a nurse. She shouldn't be coy.

She means my GCSE art coursework.
I've chosen the topic of FREEDOM.
I'm working on a homage
to Georgia O'Keeffe, a bold vibrant affirming celebration of female sexual freedom – which Wynford College, of course, deems completely inappropriate to submit.

I fold my arms and stare out of the window as our crappy tin can creaks between the rows of glossy SUVs.
I think I'm the last to arrive – there's already a parade of parents pouring down the entrance steps.

We're late because I hid the car keys – which only worked till Mum negotiated a prisoner swap with my phone.

I shade my eyes against the February sun while Mum makes a monumental mess of parking.

Something's up.
The crowd has stopped.
They're pointing at the lawn, that precious rectangle
of bright green (Keep Off The)
velvety grass.

As the strangled vowels of upper-middle-class outrage spiral into the freezing air,
I remember that thing I did last autumn.

Oops.

It was months ago.
I nicked a ton of bulbs
from the gardener's shed.
Thought I'd planted duds actually.
Who knew nature took so long?

But now spring's sprung my swear words from their trap. It's interesting how the ugly f-word
can look so pretty spelled out in the colourful language of crocus.

The very next day I'm being de-selected.
They know it was me.

Perhaps I shouldn't have ticked Horticulture
on the careers options form?

Apparently my flower display was just the final daisy in the chain.
I had been warned before.
Many times.

'Froggy' Norton,
the Head Warden,
opens his flabby mouth
and flicks his sticky tongue around the word excluded before coming out with managed move

instead.

*Marnie Staedler, he says with relish, you are just too much of a disruption.
You will have to take your exams elsewhere.*

*You will need to show
a real commitment to change before Wynford Independent
Highly Selective College for Girls can allow you back for sixth form.*

*Come back here?
He has to be kidding.
Turns out my middle digit can talk crocus too –
I must have green fingers.*

Mum takes time off work that she can't afford and drives to Wynford to fight my case, but the governors have heard about me.

My raised middle finger,
my customised school uniform,
my self-expressions in shaving foam,
the painted political protest pinned to the noticeboard, the empty vodka bottle in my bin, vapes in my drawer, compass ear piercings, stick and poke tattoos, rainbow-coloured plaits down to my waist,
and the fee-paying parents' faces when they set eyes on the message I'd embedded into the grass.

The governors say, No.

I say, That's discrimination!

On what grounds? Mum asks, shrugging off her best coat in the hall.

Age? It's a protected characteristic after all.

I don't think 'teenager' counts, Mum says,
and leans her forehead against the front door, like her face suddenly got too heavy.

If I wasn't sure before who my mum was maddest at – me or the school –
I'm pretty certain now.

Mum says I've really
crocused-up my career prospects.
I'm terrified
she could be telling the truth.

I can't even figure out how to say I'm sorry,
but I don't need to worry –
Mum's got it all worked out.

She says I need to face the consequences of my actions, learn to think before I act.

Tough love, she calls it, and she makes me ring up the local comp and tell them I've been kicked out
excluded manage-moved.

The secretary of Downham High has blocked sinuses.

I ask if they'll let me in,
just for seventeen weeks
so I can take my GCSEs.

She asks me why I lost my place at Wynford.
Nosy cow.

I dig my nails into the Play-Doh of my arm and grind my teeth through a censored version of the truth.

She listens to the whole humiliating story
before she tells me
it's already been arranged:
I start after their half-term.

Well, thanks a bunch, Mum.

You're welcome, Mum says, scraping out the peanut-butter jar.
Think of it as paying penance.

At least I don't have to tell Dad.
The last time I tried to ring him
I got number unobtainable.
Mum said that sounded about right.

The email arrives.
I start at Downham High School in a week.
Ofsted reckons the school requires improvement . . .
Maybe they think my grades will help?

But it was having more than half a brain that got me into so much trouble at Wynford.
They say they want you to think for yourself, but they don't –
not really.

It's weird being out of school.
I swiped some pens and paints from Wynford so I could do some coursework, interpret my new-found freedom through the medium of art.
But I don't feel very creative.

Mostly I wander lonely around my town, freaking out about my GCSEs.

In the library, the refugee kids crowd around a study book like it's an open fire, warming their heads with knowledge that's cheaper than fuel,
waiting for their number to come up on council waiting lists.

I don't talk to them,
because what would I say?
Sorry?

Sorry
that they have risked their lives for the chance
I've simply thrown away?

Chapter

Two

ZED

Teenage life forms

bump against me as I spin
the Fibonacci sequence to crack open my locker.

Four & a half years

of being digested in this ecosystem, trapped inside the noisy, smelly gut of Downham High, pushed along the intestinal tract of education,
by the peristalsis of the syllabi.

I'm nearly through.

Only a term & a half to go before the colonic squeeze of GCSEs pushes me out like a –

*Sh*t!*

Omar Jones slams his hand against a locker door.

I didn't do my physics!

Ms Rahman's gonna steam me for sure.

No doubt about it, I agree.

There are one thousand & sixty-three students at Downham High,

which is just above the national average – unlike our results.

The twenty-three students in 11R sit two

to a desk
every desk full except for one
empty seat beside me.

Actually,
that suits me just fine.
I do like my own
space.

Soon there will be no more Omars.
I'm aiming at a super-selective scientific sixth form,
a sure-fire springboard to Oxford.

I watch 11R bouncing around, rubbing up against each other's desks, creating so much friction as they jostle against each other, modelling atoms in a liquid state.

My classmates never get tired of talking, boasting, joking, flirting.

A stink of body spray has to fight against the daily assault of hormones.

Some of the sexual bragging might be true, but most undoubtedly isn't.

I don't care.
If anybody was to ask me how I spent my half-term break,
I'd have to say I left the house just once:
to purchase the three hundred jelly babies
I judged to be sufficient to see me through my programme of revision.

Harry Borman holds court, with one leg hitched on Rakel's desk, flashing a white sports sock
as he riffs on her virginity, talking mostly to her chest.

Rakel tells him to piss off,
& his girlfriend Jessica calls him back to heel with the dog whistle of a dirty look.

Omar Jones is laughing in the corner, homework all forgotten – again.

Hey, Zed!

Luca Moreno swans by my desk,
slapping it lightly,
the current of air he creates lifting the papers
ever so slightly.

In his wake,
they are minutely disarranged.

I don't reply.
I'm not so keen on conversation.
It has all the unpredictability of ping-pong.
Between the opening serve & the ricochet of reply, words can go

anywhere.

That's why, on the whole,
 I prefer to keep my thoughts
 to myself –

especially the ones about Luca.
