

'A TREMENDOUS NAIL-BITING READ, TENDER
AND TERRIFYING IN EQUAL MEASURE'

JACQUELINE WILSON

'HUMOUR AND PERIL,
AND TOWERING STAKES... I LOVED IT'

ROSS MONTGOMERY

1911. When a valuable and exotic animal is smuggled into the London Docks, it stands to make one man, the shady Goliath Deeds, very very rich. Heaven help anyone who dares get in his way. So when one girl stumbles into this criminal underworld, her life and the life of the baby gorilla she rescues are suddenly in great danger. Whom can Nettie trust? And can she save this very special creature?

The much-anticipated companion to the award-winning
WHEN THE SKY FALLS

'I VERY MUCH ADMIRE PHIL EARLE'S
INVENTIVENESS AND TRUTHFUL
EMOTIONAL POWER'

PHILIP PULLMAN

'PHIL EARLE IS A
MAGNIFICENT WRITER'

KATYA BALEN

'FOR YEARS NOW EARLE
HAS BEEN ONE OF OUR FINEST
WRITERS FOR YOUNG PEOPLE'

ANTHONY MCGOWAN

'ONE OF THE MOST
AUTHENTIC STORYTELLERS
WRITING FOR CHILDREN'

LESLEY PARR

ALSO AVAILABLE:

andersenpress.co.uk

ISBN 978-1-83913-419-7

9 781839 134197

£7.99

eBook available

Cover illustration
TOM CLOHOSY
COLE

THE
DAWN
OF
ADONIS
PHIL EARLE

ANDERSEN
PRESS

'TREMENDOUS'
JACQUELINE
WILSON

'I LOVED IT'
ROSS
MONTGOMERY

THE DAWN OF ADONIS

FROM THE BESTSELLING AUTHOR OF When the Sky Falls

PHIL EARLE

PRAISE FOR THE DAWN OF ADONIS:

‘Nobody writes striking, HEARTFELT ADVENTURE like Phil Earle.

The Dawn of Adonis is a showcase of everything he does best:
humour and peril and towering stakes all wrapped up in stark, spare, POWERFUL prose. I loved it!’

ROSS MONTGOMERY

‘I absolutely raced through The Dawn of Adonis! It’s a TREMENDOUS nail-biting read, tender and terrifying in equal measure. Both Toff and Nettie are fantastic characters, and little Adonis is the most endearing creature ever’

JACQUELINE WILSON

‘Another CLASSIC from a master storyteller. A total triumph and my favourite ever origin story’

ROB BIDDULPH

‘Phil Earle’s best yet! . . .
A fantastically ATMOSPHERIC high-stakes adventure’

KEITH GRAY

‘An utter TRIUMPH’ LISA THOMPSON

‘An absolute MASTERCLASS in how to write a prequel that’s possibly even better than its origin story. Pacy, poetic, heartfelt. This book deserves every rave review & prize shortlisting that’s sure to follow
. . . a standing ovation for Phil Earle’

EMMA CARROLL

‘Earle has created an immersive world, populated by compelling and believable characters. I haven’t so much read this book as lived in it. A MASTERPIECE!’

LESLEY PARR

‘I’ve stopped being surprised by the BRILLIANCE of Phil Earle. Every sentence sings, the pre-WWI setting vivid and true, the plot THRILLING, the characters engaging. Yep, it’s yet another masterpiece!’

ANTHONY MCGOWAN

PRAISE FOR WHEN THE SKY FALLS:

THE TIMES CHILDREN'S BOOK OF THE YEAR, winner of a BOOKS ARE MY BAG READERS AWARD, the BRITISH BOOK AWARD FOR CHILDREN'S FICTION and shortlisted for the CARNEGIE MEDAL

'A MAGNIFICENT story' PHILIP PULLMAN

'A DEEPLY MOVING, thought-provoking drama' DAILY MAIL

'Deeply felt, movingly written, a REMARKABLE achievement'
MICHAEL MORPURGO

'A raw, HEARTFELT tale in the tradition of Goodnight Mister Tom'
SUNDAYTIMES

PRAISE FOR WHILE THE STORM RAGES:

'Funny and HEART-WRENCHING by turns
... full of courage and determination'
GUARDIAN

'Earle's mastery is to find the heart in the most heartless situations.
His writing is LYRICAL, POWERFUL and beautiful'
MAZ EVANS

'MOVING and BRILLIANTLY WRITTEN' NEW STATESMAN

PRAISE FOR UNTIL THE ROAD ENDS:

'Warm, weepy, WONDERFUL. Victory medals all round'
THE TIMES, CHILDREN'S BOOK OF THE WEEK

'A truly BRILLIANT book' A. F. STEADMAN

'A HEARTBREAKING story of love and devotion in the midst of war'
WATERSTONES

'Phil Earle is a MAGNIFICENT writer' KATYA BALEN

THE DAWN OF ADONIS

PHIL EARLE

ANDERSEN PRESS

First published in Great Britain in 2025 by Andersen Press Limited
6 Coptic Street, London, WC1A 1NH, UK
Vijverlaan 48, 3062 HL Rotterdam, Nederland
www.andersenpress.co.uk

2 4 6 8 10 9 7 5 3 1

All rights reserved. No part of this publication may be reproduced, stored in a retrieval system or transmitted in any form, or by any means, electronic, mechanical, photocopying, recording or otherwise, without the written permission of the publisher.

The right of Phil Earle to be identified as the author of this work has been asserted by him in accordance with the Copyright, Designs and Patents Act, 1988.

Copyright © 2025, Phil Earle

British Library Cataloguing in Publication Data available.

ISBN 978 1 83913 419 7

Printed and bound in Great Britain by Clays Ltd, Elcograf S.p.A.

For Charlie Sheppard, who understands stories more deeply than anybody I've ever met.

PROLOGUE

The mountain howled: in warning and in fear.

The matted canopy couldn't contain or silence it, the rock faces above the treeline magnifying the sound to a terrifying echo. Birds flew to the highest branches, insects blended effortlessly into bark and foliage. But for the larger beasts, safety did not come as easily. They could only run, through the oppressive heat, feet pounding, chests flattening anything that dared fall into their path.

Their noise gave them away. How could it not? So as soon as their stampede began, the hunters' began too: with feet lighter, much lighter than their intentions, spears flexed, and senses tuned to their prey's frequency.

Occasionally the mountain fought back, tripping a hunter, fooling another with a low-hanging vine. But these men came as a pack, and as one fell, three more stepped forward, increasing their pace, heartbeats as loud as the branches beneath their feet.

The animals split up. Sixes became fours and twos. They spread themselves across all corners of the map, forcing the hunters to choose, hoping to throw them down false routes while they scampered to safety.

Yet the men were as devious as the animals were resourceful and had littered paths with plans of their own: pits dug then hidden, branches sharpened and wedged at the deadliest angles.

Twilight hid these perils, as did panic, the beasts thundering naively straight into their midst.

Sensing this, the hunters ran faster, not bothering to conceal their bloodlust, their voices catching up with the prey they chased so single-mindedly.

In the end, it was not a pit that brought them victory, nor a dart-sharpened bough. Instead, it was a vine, woven and threaded into a deadly knot; a hangman's noose laid amongst dying leaves and twigs.

It didn't snare the first beast, his feet merely caught the edge. Nor did it trap the second. But the third?

The third was not so lucky, the loop snagging and pulling tight round the creature's foot as it thundered past.

The animal – an ape – was a mighty foe, stronger than any of the men chasing it, yet the cry that flew from its mouth was so shrill it belonged in the throat of a terrified child. The sound shook the canopy, maddening every animal beneath it, and they in turn shouted a warning, a rallying call for the other apes to return and pull their friend free.

The hunters were now making a din of their own, whooping and clucking in celebration as they circled the prone animal, spears raised, jabbing. There was no greater prize on this mountain than the one they had ensnared, and despite its heft, the hunters had no doubt that the ape would be returning to their village with them. Alive if possible, though even in death it carried great value.

But as they set about their task, soaked darts primed, there came a final twist to the tale that would be told for years to come.

Through the foliage burst the most ferocious of sights, a second gorilla rearing up and moving at a pace which left the hunters little time to think, let alone react.

Two fell quickly, smothered and clawed, whilst two more threw their quivering spears, drawing not blood but fury from the beast – which soon left them lifeless too.

Revenge, though, wasn't what this gorilla had returned for. Crouching, he pulled at the other's leg, mighty brow furrowing when the noose tightened further. Both apes roared, in pain and frustration.

They did not see the rifle being raised, but they heard its explosion, albeit too late. The free ape saw cordite blossom from the gun's barrel, the grey flower of death, then felt the force of it blow him clean off his feet. He did not feel the impact as his back hit the ground, merely the rattle of the final breath that trickled from him. And now all that could be heard was the anguished cry of the imprisoned ape.

The remaining hunters closed in. The end of the hunt was in sight, which brought relief as they could smell the rains coming.

The mountain howled. The jungle cried, and as the heavens parted, the sky wept.

1

Rats were a common sight on Tobacco Dock. They poured off boats moored from every point of the compass – dirty, disease-ridden carpets of them, scurrying around the boots of sailors desensitised after living for months with them in their bunks, latrines and food.

Cats were brought in regularly to control them, turning the docks into a battlefield, the hubbub of bartering traders fighting the hissing of the hunters and the squeals of their prey.

Shadows were not uncommon on the docks either. They were at their longest from twilight onwards when paltry oil-lights flickered, throwing sinister shapes onto walls and into puddles.

There was one shadow, however, that was greater than any of the others cast: one that enveloped every inch of the docks whenever it chose, regardless of the season or time of day.

It belonged to a man, a monster of a man. Goliath Deeds.

If ever a name suited a person, this was it. If ever a name could send a shiver down your spine, Goliath Deeds was it.

He was not the tallest man in London, nor on the docks. There was many a sailor longer and broader than he. But not a single one of those men, nor any reprobate who plundered the seven seas, could match Goliath's intent.

Puddles parted beneath his feet, crowds did the same, only daring to move back when one, then two, shadows passed. For Goliath never travelled alone. With him, always three steps behind, followed a boy.

He didn't dress like a boy. Didn't dress like the common man either. His wardrobe was entirely of his own creation. The boy knew what he liked, and compiled his outfits from items he'd managed to pilfer from laundries, washing lines and gentlemen's outfitters. It was just as well he had these devious skills, as he rarely had a shilling to his name. Shirts, braces, shoes, there wasn't a garment the boy couldn't purloin, and his wardrobe bulged like a butcher's gut. The only problem he had was keeping his threads clean.

As a result, there was a strange contradiction to the boy: he could be described as a dandy, but a grimy, bedraggled one: the best example being the hat that seldom left his head. It was a bowler, black in colour, worn at a jaunty angle and complete with a feather that he replaced at regular intervals. Pigeon, pheasant, he wore them all. But like the rest of his outfit, there was a twist to the hat, as the top of it seemed to have exploded, with jagged shards reaching up to the skies, forming an uneven and chaotic crown.

'Blame my brain,' he'd retort when asked about it. 'The ideas I have, they're so big, there's not a hat that can hold them in.'

He was a card, a live wire and the oldest twelve-year-old you could ever meet. He'd seen things, done things, felt things that people who lived for a century would never experience. Nor want to.

‘Keep up, Squabble,’ growled Goliath without turning.

The boy could’ve chosen to hate it when called by his surname for a number of reasons, the main one being that it wasn’t his actual name. The same was true of his forename. That didn’t belong to him either.

When he was found abandoned, mere days old, on the Foundling Hospital steps, wrapped in newspaper like a bag of chips, there was little indication of who the boy was or who had birthed him. All that he owned hung around his neck on a ratty length of twine: half a coin, beaten wafer thin then cut jaggedly in half. Tucked into the newspaper was a simple note with questionable spelling – ‘I wil cum for you wiv the rest of the coyn’.

He needed a name, so the nurses gave him one, like they did so many of the children in their care. Tom Teal: simple, and cheap on ink, which stuck until his seventh year, when a shadow fell on his life. A shadow that had loomed ever since.

Goliath Deeds arrived at Coram’s Foundling Hospital from nowhere, a kindly expression on his face that clearly hurt to wear.

‘His ma’s half-brother,’ he’d declared himself. ‘Overseas till late. Din’t know my sister had passed, let alone about the nipper!’

Tom had recoiled from the man. He had no memory of his mother, but this, this . . . character did not sit well with her image in his mind. She was soft and kind, smelled of bread from warm ovens and flowers. This man smelled of anything but.

But, just as Tom had hoped that Goliath would be turned away as a charlatan, the man brandished an item that changed the boy's life irrevocably – an arc of hammered metal, that sat as tightly as a jigsaw piece against the shard Tom wore close to his chest.

'I am not a rich man,' Goliath had boomed, 'but I have ambitions and goals, ones that the boy can share in, if he works hard and follows direction. The world is growing, the docks are thriving and a boy can learn everything he needs to know there. Between the docks and me? We'll educate him. Make him a man.'

Regardless of what feelings Tom might have had on this, he soon found himself in the care of his new 'uncle', and Deeds was true to his word: they found themselves on the docks daily, though the many things he learned were not in any textbook.

The first thing that had to change was his name.

'Tom Teal is no name to carry all your life,' Goliath told him.

Tom's ears liked the sound of this. 'Am I a Deeds?'

'Not yet you aren't. Names are earned. And that surname would make you practically royalty. I've been watching you, though. Seen the pride you take in your appearance, as well as the fact you could start an argument in an empty pub.'

Tom couldn't disagree with either of those points and had learned quickly that the man was not someone to contradict on anything.

‘Tom Teal is dead,’ Goliath declared, like he was officiating at a coronation. ‘Long live Toff Squabble.’

It was a name that soon became known everywhere he went, and by the age of twelve, Toff wore it like a medal, even on a night as filthy as this one.

‘What we even doin’ here?’ he moaned now. ‘Weather like this gives me the willies. And the puddles are playing havoc with my spats.’

He wasn’t kidding, the white material covering his shoes was far from pristine now, more a dirty, ratty brown, and he knew it would be a beggar to shift no matter how hard he scrubbed.

‘That’s what spats are for, you fool,’ rebuked Goliath sharply. ‘To stop you getting spattered.’ He finally turned round to the boy, eyes just about visible beneath his woollen cap.

‘But I ain’t got a spare pair, Goliath.’

‘Stop your whinging, do as you’re told tonight, and you’ll be able to afford a pair for every day of the week.’

‘That’s what you said about me waistcoat last week.’ But Toff had the wisdom to say this quietly, not wishing to light Goliath’s short fuse.

They stomped on, past ale houses promising more than just the delights of alcohol, and shops selling anything and everything, from paraffin to parrots, rope to rum.

Toff’s eyes were drawn to the many exotic birds on offer.

Their rainbowed feathers didn't belong here, but the boy was glad of their presence. It made his own just about tolerable.

Toff was toying with asking how much further, when Goliath hastily applied the brakes. Toff did the same, avoiding walking straight into his back. He'd done it once before and worn the bruises for weeks. This was the way of life with Goliath. You might make a mistake once, but never twice.

'See this place,' Goliath said, pointing at a shop sign. 'See what it says?'

Toff looked at the elaborate, scrolling text and read it effortlessly, unlike most children of his age or standing.

'Jamrach's Animal Emporium,' he said aloud. Toff was smart, but Goliath had still done an excellent job teaching him his letters. The man may have been a thug, but he was a complex one.

'That's right. Know what it means?'

'Fancy word for shop, ain't it. Don't know who Jamrach is though.'

'Charles Jamrach.'

Toff shrugged, none the wiser.

'Jamrach was a rich man. And a lucky one, which makes him the worst kind. Every bit of wealth he inherited was off his old man, a German, who used to be chief of the river police in Hamburg. Made him friends with a lot of sailors, opened his eyes to a lot of the valuable cargo they was carrying: animals. And not just cats and dogs. Exotic animals.' Goliath's eyes widened as he said it. Toff swore he saw fires ignite in them.

‘Like what?’

‘You name it. Zebras. Camels. Lions.’

‘Stroll on. Lions?’

‘Tigers too. Forty years back, he had one in this very shop that escaped.’

‘He never did.’

‘Went on the rampage. Scooped up a boy. Jamrach himself had to get hold of the beast by the throat and pull the child free.’

‘He weren’t dead?’

‘Saved his life, Jamrach did. Didn’t stop the boy’s parents getting the law on Jamrach, mind. Sued him. Three hundred pound they won.’

‘How’s his shop still ’ere then? Must’ve ruined him . . .’

‘Ruined him? Made him a small fortune. Word got out that Jamrach had this deadly tiger and the dealers went crazy for it. Queueing up at the door, wanting him to supply things for their menageries and shows, they were. By the time he struck a deal with George Wombwell, that animal was the most feared in London. The crowds flocked in their hundreds to see him, day after day.’

Toff stared at Goliath, a tad confused.

‘What’s any of this got to do with us?’

It was unusual for Goliath to tell stories, unless there was something in it for him, or there was a threat at the end of it.

‘I’m tired, boy.’ Goliath didn’t look tired. He looked like he was plotting, as he so often did. ‘Tired of men like Jamrach having it easy. I mean, look at this place. The old man's dead now, but his sons? They're richer than ever. Every time Barnum and Bailey or another circus needs to up their game, it's here they come. Well, it's time someone gave 'em a shock. A bit of competition. And that someone is me.'

This was news to Toff. Goliath was a legend in the East End; hell, the man was both famous and infamous. But he didn't tend to mix with those above him socially: Goliath broke bones rather than bread.

'I don't get it, Goliath. We buying something from 'ere?' Toff eyed the window suspiciously. There were parrots and songbirds a plenty, whilst inside a cage a snake swirled around a wooden cross. They looked exotic. Beautiful. Expensive.

'You ask too many questions, boy. No, we're not buying anything from them. We're going to get ourselves a slice of the action. I ever let you down yet?'

This was a loaded question, and one that if Toff answered honestly, would earn him a cuff round the head.

'Course not,' he said.

'Follow me then,' Goliath grinned. 'The high life is just round the next corner.'

2

If this was the high life, then the rich were welcome to it.

The stinking alleyway was just as chock full of puddles and there were now no gas lamps to herald their way. This may have been a blessing, for if Toff had seen the putrid filth covering his spats, he would've had a duck fit.

'You sure about thi—' Toff began, before thinking better of it. Goliath marched on, his stride not shortening with the lack of light.

'Up here.'

They turned a sharp left. There were no shops. Just warehouses like the one they lived in, rotting doors promising the distinct likelihood of sinister happenings behind them.

Goliath stopped at the grimmest, fist rapping. The timber groaned, as did a voice inside.

'Gently, will you!!' There was a pause, then a hacking cough. 'That you, Deeds? Come in.' The smell inside was rancid. Something was rotting and had been for some time. At first sight, it appeared to be coming from the silhouette bent in front of them. It was difficult to make out the age of the man, so contorted was his shape, hinging at the waist like he was carrying the weight of London on his back.

‘I said to come on your own,’ the voice said. ‘This ain’t a circus.’

‘You invite me, you invite the boy,’ Goliath replied.

Toff wanted to add that he was family, but was never sure how Deeds was going to react to such an announcement.

The shadowy man’s features became clearer, not that anyone wished for this to be the case. Erasmus Gryce. A human skeleton with a ratty, lank ponytail and a smirk of yellowing teeth clinging to his gums. His eyes were practically slits, sunk deep into sallow skin: his beard reedy and stained yellow with baccy.

‘Your boy, is it?’

The old man stared at Toff, like he was examining his very soul. Fortunately, Goliath cut this short, bearing down on the man, fuse lit.

‘It’s none of your concern who he is. If you’ve brought me here to waste time then I’ll refashion that face of yours double quick.’

‘Goliath, my friend.’ Erasmus stooped even deeper. ‘Come now. I made you a promise, and Erasmus always delivers.’

‘You owe me, Gryce,’ Goliath spat, ‘and that debt grows with every breath of mine you waste.’

‘Best follow me then,’ Erasmus leered, shuffling back into the darkness.

For once, Toff was happy to be in Goliath’s epic shadow. He didn’t know what was lurking beyond and felt no burning desire to find out.

The smell got worse. It seemed to be coming from the darkest reaches of the warehouse: a sickly brew of faeces and filth. Goliath didn't hesitate, overtaking Erasmus when the man became too slow.

'This had better not be a hoax,' Goliath warned.

'Not a hoax, you'll see. You'll be shouting from the rooftops when you see what old Erasmus found, just for you.'

Despite the darkness, Goliath's excitement was clear to see. It made Toff even more nervous. It wasn't like him. Deeds did menace in abundance. Menace and vengeance and sheer undiluted aggression, but excitement?

They arrived now at a tall cage, the iron bars thick, rusted, and laced in algae that suggested a long voyage at sea.

It didn't stop Goliath gripping them, as he struggled with the failing light.

'If this cage is empty, Gryce, then you are a dead man. You hear me? Extinct.'

Toff gulped nervously.

The old man made no reply, picking up a paraffin lamp and lighting that instead.

The flame flickered, then glowed: warming Goliath's bewhiskered face as he snatched the lamp impatiently. There was a clang as it hit the bars. He would have pushed it through them had there been the space, so desperate was he to seek his prize within.

But whatever the bounty was, still wasn't clear. The lamp simply illuminated a huge, matted bundle of fur, balled in the corner. It was not a pretty sight. The fur was tangled, seemingly in its own excrement, and now the light was on it there was no doubt where the ungodly stench was emanating from: this dead thing. It had been an animal of some description, presumably, but now it lay lifeless.

Goliath's face darkened, pupils glinting red as his temper ignited. Dropping the lantern, he grabbed Erasmus Gryce and threw him against the bars. There was a thud and a crack, of ribs presumably, and the old man could only whimper in fear and pain as Goliath Deeds' nose was thrust into his face.

'I warned you,' Deeds hissed. 'Don't try and trick me. But you didn't listen. You will though, I promise you, even if I have to rip you new earholes to help along the way.'

But as the threats continued, Toff Squabble saw something that took his attention from the unfolding violence.

A twitch. A rustle.

Grasping the lamp, he darted round the cage, eyes widening as he saw a sight that would delight his master and possibly save the life of the despicable Erasmus Gryce.

3

‘Goliath. Goliath. It’s alive!’

Deeds was on the move before Gryce hit the ground, ripping the lamp off Toff and squinting inside the cage.

‘What’d it do?’ he demanded.

‘Moved, didn’t it? Not that I have a clue what it is.’

‘It,’ cried a pained Gryce. ‘It is exactly what you asked for. Exactly what you demanded. Exotic. Fierce. A god amongst beasts.’

This description did not marry up to the twisted rug of fur slumped in the corner, but as Goliath and Toff looked again, they saw more movement. An unfolding, as limbs became visible, then hands or feet, black fingers and blacker nails, encrusted with filth.

‘What the ’ell is it?’ Toff gasped, but Goliath hadn’t a clue either, not until a head appeared, two green pupils reflecting the glare of the torch before flinching behind its fingers.

‘Blimey . . . that’s a monkey,’ Toff said.

‘Monkey?’ scoffed Gryce. ‘You think I’d bring you, my most trusted customer, a monkey?’ He seemed to be in his element again, battered ribs forgotten. ‘This is the King, the scourge of the mountains. All the way from the densest peaks of Africa . . . this, my friends, is a silverback gorilla.’

‘He stinks.’ Toff couldn’t help himself.
‘So would you if you’d spent months tossed around at sea.’
‘Din’t anyone feed him? Shape ’e’s in, I reckon I could take him with one arm tied behind my back.’

‘Toff!’ barked Goliath.

Toff looked to Deeds.

‘Shut it.’

‘Who else knows about this animal?’ Goliath demanded.

‘Except us three mortals, not a soul.’

‘Then how did it end up in your grubby mitts? Treasure like this always ends up with the Jamrach boys.’

‘What can I say, Goliath? The trader saw in me a reputable man, an honest man. A man interested only in providing for his family.’

‘Nonsense. So come on, what’s wrong with it?’

‘Wrong?’ Gryce looked affronted.

‘Last chance,’ Goliath growled. ‘Last chance before I do what a dentist should’ve done for you decades ago.’ He curled his fist, knuckles cracking expectantly.

But before he was able to unleash his fury and frustration, Toff interjected.

‘Ere, Goliath. I ain’t no vet or nothing, but ain’t a silverback the male?’

‘He’s right,’ said Gryce gratefully. ‘Listen to the boy instead of taking your anger out on me.’

‘Well, if that’s the case,’ Toff went on, ‘then this fella ’ere is either proper shy, or . . .’

‘Or WHAT?!’ Goliath was pure simmering rage now.

‘Or this ain’t no king of the jungle at all . . . this ’ere’s the queen.’

Goliath erupted. ‘What are you talking about? Stop talking in bloody riddles!’

‘It’s a girl!’ Toff yelled. ‘A female. See? She ain’t got no . . . bits!’

Goliath bent his redwood legs to look closely. ‘Why is it, Gryce, that everything I buy from you has got something missing!’

Erasmus knew this was his time to bolt.

‘Stop him, Toff,’ said Goliath, eyes still on the ape. Toff did as instructed, but feared for what would follow. Gryce felt light in his grasp, his bones hollow. The old man knew better than to put up a fight.

‘I’ve tried to be decent to you, haven’t I?’ Goliath said quietly, as he returned to his considerable height. ‘In all our dealings, Erasmus, have I ever treated you wrong? Gone back on my word? Taken you for a fool?’

Erasmus cowered in Toff’s grip. The boy felt his own dread rise.

‘You haven’t, Goliath, no.’

‘Then what part of you believed that I wouldn’t mind you lying to me.’

‘I didn’t know, Goliath, did I? I was told—’

‘Lies,’ Goliath mouthed.

‘It’s true. I promi—’

But the final word to ever leave Erasmus Gryce’s mouth was never completed, and in a way it was fitting, as the man had never honoured a single promise in his sixty-three years on the earth. He had lied, cheated, scammed and stolen. He wasn't a fool, but had made a huge error in mistaking Goliath for one.

His feet were off the ground now, grasping for a floorboard that wasn't there. Goliath made sure of that, a single hand around Gryce's turkey-throat.

The old man tried to plead, to pray, to offer whatever Goliath wanted, but while the thoughts formed, the words couldn't. The hand choking him closed tighter, and tighter, the sight of Goliath's unrepentant, hardened face grew hazier and darker, until Erasmus' will was extinguished and his limp, broken body was thrown to the ground.

Toff stood, silent. His world changed for ever. He was not a naïve child. He'd seen so much that he didn't think himself a child at all. He had lived in Goliath's orbit long enough to know threat, violence and revenge, but this was the first time he'd witnessed murder. He felt too close to it. Was it contagious? Would he catch it? He took a step backwards but stopped when he felt Goliath's judging eyes upon him. He may not die too, not now at least, but he had more than witnessed murder, he'd been complicit in one.

Toff felt sick, like every drop of blood had fallen to his feet. But he couldn't show it. He mustn't. Goliath was a bad man, the worst of them, but at the same time, he was Toff's only family. The only thing standing between him and a life alone and on the street.

So, he did nothing, which made the nausea engulf him further.

Breathe, he told himself. Breathe and wait for orders.

When they came, he would follow them to the letter.

As usual.

Quick smart.

WHEN THE SKY FALLS

PHIL EARLE

The multi-award-winning story about the incredible friendship between a young boy and a silverback gorilla in the Second World War, inspired by a true story.

1941. War is raging. And one angry boy has been sent to the city, where bombers rule the skies. There, Joseph will live with Mrs F, a gruff woman with no fondness for children. Her only loves are the rundown zoo she owns and its mighty silverback gorilla, Adonis. As the weeks pass, bonds deepen and secrets are revealed, but if the bombers set Adonis rampaging free, will either of them be able to end the life of the one thing they truly love?

‘A magnificent story . . .

It deserves every prize going’

Philip Pullman

‘An extraordinary story with historical and family truth at its heart, that tells us as much about the present as the past. Deeply felt, movingly written, a remarkable achievement’

Michael Morpurgo

WHEN THE SKY FALLS
GRAPHIC NOVEL COMING SOON!