

FEELING GRUMPY

A monkey might feel grumpy if another monkey takes its fruit.

It might scream and bare its teeth, thump the ground and run around.

A big, toothy grin might be nice coming from your best friend but from a monkey it could mean trouble. Monkeys sometimes show their teeth when they're angry.

Friends help to calm the monkey down by picking fleas from off its fur. They make their peace and get to eat a juicy little jungle treat.

Yummy fleas!
Yes please.

Monkeys brush and clean each other's fur after getting angry, just like you might hug someone to make up after falling out.

FEELING HAPPY

A horse will feel especially happy with some friends it really likes.

When horses meet to say hello, their happy feelings really show!

Happy horses nuzzle and gently rub each other's necks and faces.

I FEEL HAPPY, TOO

When they're playing, rats will squeak. They make a happy cheep, cheep, cheep.

Playtime is cheeping time!

Pet rats often squeak when they're happy, just like you might laugh when you're tickled! This noise is too high-pitched for us humans to hear though.

FEELING SAD

A Canada goose will raise its chicks with the same partner every year.

But if it finds its partner dead, it bows its head, swims off alone and drifts around all on its own.

I miss my partner.
Honk, honk.

If its partner dies, a goose will leave its flock for a while. It sometimes makes sad honking noises, just like you might cry out when you're upset.

Returning to friends back in its flock should help cure its heartbreak pain.

And it may, one happy day, find itself new love again!

Wolves, elephants, whales and parrots all show they're sad if their friends die, but only humans shed tears of sadness when they are upset.
