

WILD EAST

ASHLEY HICKSON-LOVENCE

Illustrated by Camilla Ru

PENGUIN

CONTENT WARNING

Before you begin reading, please be aware that small parts of this book may be triggering for some readers. While it is a work of fiction, this book is grounded in many aspects of modern life and covers some serious topics that readers should be aware of, including knife crime, county lines and physical violence.

AUTHOR'S NOTE

Growing up with my mum and little brother in our council flat in Hackney, East London, I never thought I would be an author or a doctor of Creative Writing with a PhD one day. Mainly because, when I was at school, I rarely read books written by people like me, about people like me.

Slowly things seem to be changing.

If you've ever felt unseen, unsure or unsafe, a little shy or even outright terrified, in or out of the classroom, then Wild East has been written for you. This is a story for those who – like the main character, Ronny – might not consider themselves readers usually but are still, in some way, in some form, a lover of words.

Ashley Hickson-Lovence

WILD EAST PLAYLIST

'All For Maz' – Castro

'Please Don't Move to London It's a Trap' – Murkage Dave

'Expensive Pain' – Rimzee (feat. Born Trappy)

'Plants Don't Grow' – Frankie Stew and Harvey Gunn (feat. Kamran Kaur)

'County Lines 1' – Frosty

'2009' – Mac Miller

'Light & Dark' – Dré Six

'Dreamgirl' – Calum O'Rourke (feat. Tyler Lovence)

'Pumped Up Kicks' – Foster the People

'Turn' – RV and Headie One (feat. Unknown T)

'Gratitude' – Mr Jukes and Barney Artist

'Building Castles' – Bawo

'Crazy Year' – Dimzy, LD and 67

Plants don't grow
when it's dark and cold.
Something that seemed so simple is the part unknown.

– Frankie Stew and Harvey Gunn

PROLOGUE

A glance as sharp as a shard of broken glass.

His dark eyes slicing souls open with crystal-clear precision on the top deck of this 43 bus, we've become targets locked in his vision.

'What you looking at?' he says, words all jagged and pointy, loaded like a strap and hanging heavy, weighty enough for every passenger to hear.

We didn't know we were looking at him, not really, Maz and I, no more than a little peep if we were – certainly didn't mean to cause offence.
We've just been chilling, in all honesty, chatting and joking around doing stupid impressions of our teachers and stuff – but this guy sat at the very back is getting all riled up.

'Oi, did you not hear me?' he says louder than before, his voice all strained and spiky.
'What you looking at?'
He seems to be addressing me now only.

He's sat with this other guy, quieter but looks just as menacing, both like sixteen, seventeen, eighteen at a stretch maybe.
Either way, just a few years older than us and unlike Maz and me, not in school uniform.

I think they've got it twisted because I know I've never seen either of them before.
Where I come from, you remember every spot, scratch or scar of someone's face, so this must be a case of mistaken identity, it has to be.

The two of them sit sprawled across the five seats at the back and we're sat half turned to them, Maz on one side of the aisle, me on the other,
just a few rows in front,
on the top deck of this double-decker bus, the current scene of this unprovoked but not totally unexpected verbal attack.
When you live in London you can't ever let your guard down just like that.

Me and Maz, best friends since Year Seven,
same form class, school football team, always get this bus home together, take it basically every day,

from our school in Archway, past Holloway,
and Highbury, along City Road, through Islington and into Hackney.

Maz is mad good at art, wants to do it for GCSE.
He's a guaranteed Grade 9, easily one of the best in the year, maybe even the whole school; good at doing realistic portraits of people and landscapes of the city.

But this picture here is not looking pretty.

In seconds the mood has shifted.
This guy's serious and now the blood's proper thumping under my skin, as painful as punches to the ribs.
He's angrily pointing his fingers at me and his fury is hard to ignore, we're definitely looking at him now even if we weren't looking before.

'Nothing to say, yeah,' he says, again, just speaking to me specifically.
'Not a big man any more, yeah,' he adds, rising from his seat now, aggressively.

We can't take this, can we?

Maz has had enough and starts to speak up, taking matters into his own hands on my behalf.
Calls him names in reply, names he deserves undoubtedly but still feels strange to hear at like four in the afternoon on a Wednesday.

But I suppose he's got the right idea –
we can't look weak,
made to look a joke
by this joker talking silly in front of all these people, just like ten minutes or so from our ends where we grew up, where we were born and raised.

The other passengers seem to ignore what's going on completely, or what might be just about to happen.
They only half look,
they only half care,
this disagreement a minor inconvenience they can forget about in five or ten minutes.

Some of them saw Stormzy the other summer, headlining Glastonbury so instead of getting involved, defend or protect,
they read a Guardian book review or scroll through ASOS for something to wear for their work summer barbecue.

This is the youth of today, and this is what they do:
through anger is how they communicate.

Blame the Mayor of London, Sadiq Khan.

Blame drill music.

Blame bad parenting.

(They don't care. Not really.)

'I'm not doing this. Come, Ronny,' suggests Maz sensibly as he gets up and heads towards the stairs quickly, ready to get off before all hell breaks loose, before this all gets out of hand.

The passengers breathe a sigh of relief, can get on with the rest of their day and maybe that's the end of it. This drama to them like a scene from Top Boy on Netflix, watch a bit and then press the OFF switch.

But as we stomp down the stairs, Maz spouting parting shots, me staying quiet, scampering behind trying to keep up without looking back,
I hear footsteps follow us off.

Now we're walking towards Islington Green, and even Maz seems keen to get away, but this guy is not giving me the space, his trigger finger jabbing my temple and I'm too shook to react,
too scared to respond.
My heart in my throat,
the heat in my face.

These guys are moving mad, the main one in particular,
limbs flailing and fizzy, legs and arms all frenetic.

In our rush to escape and get away, we barge past a posh couple who at first act outraged but then see what's going on and say nothing.

She's brunette and wearing Birkenstocks, he's wearing khaki shorts and camo-coloured Crocs.

I spot the tightness of his knuckles as he grips her hand and leads her from the commotion.
I clock his watch – could be a Rolly, or an Audemars – and he's brave for wearing one of those around these parts, but at this moment,
he's not the one in danger . . .

We are.

Because this bus guy's bobbing about like a boxer, but it's not his fists he's threatening us with.
No, there's too much fury involved now, he's in too deep to back out and seems ready to match words with actual action.

There's something shapely in this boy's tracksuit, recognizable from playground stories or films, music videos on YouTube.

The sunlight is gleaming off his shiny forehead, droplets of his sweat spread and start to drip as this scuffle spills from the pavement on to the streets and Maz is shouting back now, not letting it go –

it's not what he knows – but when the guy's hand dips, I duck.

Me and Maz, best friends since Year Seven;
same form class, school football team, but he's in real trouble here because now it's two against one.

I've gone.

I'm fleeing the scene at speed and, as I break into a full sprint and glance back, I see a glimmer of a knife-edge, the stainless-steel shine of a black-handled seven-inch.

Maz – weaponless, of course, his only defence his desperate pleas – is flooded.

The liquid pours:
his blood, my tears.

